Caring for someone has many positive and rewarding aspects to it and it can be the most loving thing you can do for someone else. It can however, also be challenging, leaving you feeling exhausted and in some cases can be extremely lonely and isolating. If you find you are struggling it is important to ask for help and support.

Caring for elderly parents

Our parents bring us up and do everything for us when we are children, so it can come as a shock when they start to require care themselves. As people age or develop disabilities, you may need to ask for help to take care of elderly parents.

Persuading parents to accept help can be difficult, but it's important that everybody is open and honest about their hopes and fears. Explain to your parents that you are worried they are struggling to manage.

A big decision you and your parents may have to make is about whether they will receive at-home care or whether they will move into a residential care home, this may consist of sheltered housing, assisted living or a nursing home. Talk to specialists and those involved in your parents' care, such as their GP, any social workers involved or staff at care homes. Ensure you involve your parents in these discussions.

Caring for someone with a disability

Looking after someone with a physical disability can be physically demanding for you as a carer. An important part of your role is to make sure the person you care for has the best quality of life possible by helping them to be as independent as possible.

There is no ideal way to care for someone with a disability. Each person is different, each with a different disability. Here are some things you can do to help make life as a carer that little bit easier for you both:

Take time to understand their illness or condition - the term disability is varied. It's therefore important for you to research the disability itself to help understand the challenges it's likely to present. This knowledge can help you empathise more with your loved one.

Focus on their abilities rather than their disabilities - when caring for a disabled person at home, it's easy to focus on what they can't do and do it for them. In order to be as independent as possible, it's important to try to encourage them to do as many of the things they can themselves, and only step in when they really need help.

Think ahead - all types of disabilities will present unexpected challenges every day. Planning for emergencies in advance can enable you to respond as well as possible to the unexpected.

If you can it's useful for you to attend health appointments with your loved one where possible, taking a list of questions with you so that you can be fully informed. Another thing you might want to think ahead about is making legal arrangements. For instance, has your loved one made a Will and do they have power of attorney in place.

Caring for someone with dementia

Caring for someone with Dementia can be daunting, challenging, and exhausting. Here are some things to consider.

Accept support - this support may come from other members of your family, a professional or a support group. Just don't be afraid to accept or ask for help. This help will allow you to take a break and have some time to yourself.

Be empathetic - as a carer compassion and empathy are at the heart of what you are doing. Be patient and understanding, don't criticize and judge.

Look after their overall wellbeing - make sure the person with dementia regularly has their physical health monitored and ensure they receive the appropriate health advice or treatment. It's important they remain active, eat a balanced diet and get enough sleep.

Dementia Specific Support - seek out advice, support, education, and training. This could involve investigating local services, joining a social or peer support group.

Be positive - focus on their strengths and think about what they can still do, rather than what they can't. Prioritise things that bring them peace and joy and avoid negative comments.

Be realistic - those with dementia will have good and bad days. Be realistic about the course of the disease, remember that most types of dementia are irreversible and progressive.

Plan ahead - when caring for someone with dementia things will change, so you should prepare for a time when their loved one may need more care than you can provide, this may be provided from a professional coming into your home each day or with your loved one moving into a residential setting. You will need to prepare yourself for this emotionally and plan financially for this change.

Caring for grandchildren

Many parents struggle to balance work and family life and as a grandparent you may have been asked to help out. This help can range from regular childcare for babies and toddlers, dropping off and picking up children from school, to helping out when the children are ill or during the school holidays.

As a grandparent it is great for you and the children to be able to spend quality time together and it brings many rewards, however, before you agree to providing regular childcare, it's important to consider what you feel comfortable taking on, and how it's going to affect your life. Talk to your child and their partner and explain how you feel, this honesty from the start may stop any problems in the future.

Caring for yourself

Caring can be both physically and mentally exhausting, you may be getting up several times in the night, you may have to lift an adult who is heavier than you, or you may be juggling caring whilst also holding down a job. You may also have the emotional distress of seeing a loved one suffering. It is important that you take care of your own health, even if you are busy looking after someone else's. Being healthy is not only important for you, but it also helps the person you care for too. Remember you can't pour from an empty cup. Caring for others may lead to mental health conditions including stress and depression.

Recognising your own needs will help you balance caring with the rest of your life; it will also ensure you are physically and mentally well enough to care for your loved one as well as you can. As a carer you may experience a range of emotions, including feelings of isolation, anger, guilt, stress and fatigue.

All of these feelings are natural but in order to overcome them, some of the tips below may help:

- Talk to others in a similar situation or join a support group
- Seek out the national organisation devoted to the condition or illness that you are dealing with
- Ask other members of the family for help to give you a break and avoid burnout
- Speak to a counsellor, therapist or your GP about how you are feeling

Caring for yourself is absolutely vital when you are caring for somebody else. The tips below may help:

- Ensure you are eating well and drinking enough water
- Ensure you are getting enough rest
- Set some time aside for yourself every day and do something you enjoy
- Get exercise when you can
- Consider downloading a meditation or mindfulness app
- Write in a journal about what you are going through and how you feel
- If you are still working request compassionate leave or flexible working

Recognising your own needs will help you balance caring with the rest of your life, it will also ensure you are physically and mentally well enough to care for your loved one as well as you can.

Financial assistance for carers

Having the right financial aid can really help when caring for a loved one at home. There are a range of different benefits that offer that little bit of extra support, including:

Carer's Allowance - if you care for someone at least 35 hours a week and they get certain benefits you could get a weekly allowance. You do not have to be related to, or live with, the person you care for.

Carer's Credit - a National Insurance credit that helps with gaps in your NI record. You're eligible for this if you care for someone at least 20 hours a week.

Disability Living Allowance for Children - may be payable if you care for a disabled child.

Carer Premium - an additional premium on top of other benefits you can claim. The benefits you can claim the premium on include universal credit, income support, Jobseeker's Allowance, employment support allowance, housing benefit, pension and tax credits, and council tax.

Additionally, depending on your age and circumstances you may also be entitled to Pension Credit and additional local welfare assistance.
